MOOD:  cheerful

MUSIC: Dire Straits - Ride Across The River

My tops of middle and fourth toe on my right foot are developing the oddest little raised calluses from my climbing shoes.

Also, my middle toes are getting pointy.

 cvillette (<https://cvillette.livejournal.com/>), you did not warn me about this.

I recall saying something very similar to my best friend about no longer being able to wear a 3/4 length sleeve, because of having forearms like a blacksmith. He asked if I'd rather *not* be able to use my 2-handed, er, 'illegitimate' sword instead.

It all comes back into perspective when you look at it that way, I find. I never liked 3/4 length sleeves anyway. They tickle.

Some people find muscular forearms hawt.

In short sleeves, or something sleeveless, yes, agreed. Even in long sleeves, you can see the muscle there. And I'd be surprised to hear anybody say they really **like** stick-thin forearms (and on a tangent, have you ever noticed how many weightlifters seem to totally neglect the forearm? Looks nasty, if you ask me). But speaking from my own experience, on one occasion when I was clothes shopping with my mother and she handed me this sort of peach-coloured silky thing with the 3/4 sleeve... the sleeve stopped just on the widest part of my forearm, and it looked like somebody had shaved a shire horse and stuck its leg in there. Really incongruous, you know? I laughed, anyway. Mum... was less cheerful about it. Not as bad as when she realised what I'd done to my calves, mind you. Which are lopsided, because I fought with a definite dominant lead-side...

Which is a very long-winded way of saying, 'Yes, but **not** in a 3/4 length sleeve.'

Pointy middle toe--the mark of the demon climber spawn! (Don't laugh--a second toe longer than one's big toe was once considered diagnostic of a witch. Let's not examine the genetics of that one too closely.)

Your shoes are your mountain goat hooves. You have to expect a little modification when you turn chimera. **g**
